Business succession planning is a process that requires business owners to identify a successor and establish a transition timeline in order to ensure a smooth, successful transfer of company ownership, while simultaneously satisfying the current owner’s future financial needs. Not surprisingly, owners need to think carefully about a variety of issues, many of which are highly personal and perhaps even unpleasant in the sense that judgments must be made about the abilities of family members and how well the next generation will fare when the current owners are gone. Nevertheless, with a careful approach and access to the proper resources, the task of succession planning can be completed in a manageable and effective manner.

In a broad sense, succession plans generally fall into one of three categories: First, the plan may be to transfer ownership to the next generation by operation of testamentary documents. In some respects, this is often the default plan. If nothing is done to the contrary, the result upon the death of the transferor generation is typically to leave assets, including the ownership of the family business, to the next generation. In these circumstances, buy-out provisions should be considered if only certain members of the next generation will be involved in the operations of the business. The second type of plan is to sell the business upon the death of the transferor generation, and allow the next generation to receive the proceeds. This approach transitions the business out of the family, and in some cases this approach is viewed as the safer alternative, since the risk of mismanagement by the next generation is removed, and the value earned by the hard work and successes of the transferor generation is preserved for future generations through a liquidity event. The third approach is to plan for the family to retain ownership of the business, but to pre-arrange for non-family management to run the business for the family.

There is no one approach that is best for all situations. The structure of the succession plan will depend on many factors and preferences. Nevertheless, some general considerations and concepts that should help lead to the right decisions are:

1. The business requirements should be given priority. This requires an objective and critical evaluation as to whether or not a successor generation of family members possesses the skill, experience, and motivation to continue the success of the family business. This requirement is critical inasmuch as the process should be structured so that sufficient time is available to allow family members to learn the business, develop the skills, and demonstrate the desire to own and run the business. This process can take years to accomplish depending on the complexity of the business and the background and experience of the family members. Similarly, realistic projections about the future of the business must be prepared. In addition, an analysis of the changes likely to impact the business must be made to properly determine the resources and skills the business will need to both survive and increase its success. A realistic evaluation of the needs of the business and how well the available skills address those needs is essential to the process.

2. Execute testamentary documents that work immediately. Generally, the documents can be changed if circumstances warrant adjustment, but too often testamentary plans are structured assuming certain events or a particular sequence of events will happen. The future is not assured, so the testamentary plan, including the transfer of the family business, must work whenever the need arises.

3. Get experienced, professional help to make sure the succession plan you want is the plan that actually results from the testamentary and business documents and related agreements. This includes getting accurate advice regarding the estate and income tax implications of the plan. Consideration should be given to capital and liquidity needs during the transition period, and often there is a role for life insurance products as part of the succession plan.

4. Involve the affected family members in the development of the plan, and listen and address carefully their concerns and desires. If there is a disconnect between the current owner’s plans and what the transferee generation wants, the plan, no matter how well intended, has little chance of success. Utilizing experienced professionals to participate in the process and explain the importance of an open and honest discussion can help alleviate tensions and make the discussions more productive and productive. It is important to acknowledge that the plan to successfully transfer the business between generations may not allow for equal gifting of the business to the next generation due to certain business considerations. Often times, buy-out provisions will be required to achieve this objective. When this situation arises, it may be helpful to seek professional advice as to how best to communicate the disparity of gifts to the next generation in a way that assures, to the extent possible, that tension or disputes among heirs is minimized.

The foregoing concepts can help establish a workable succession plan. However, there are numerous strategies and options for succession planning, only a few of which are touched upon in this article. No one approach is right for every business. Rather, the plan will be driven by the unique facts of each case. Accordingly, plans can range from highly complex arrangements requiring extensive documentation to relatively simple arrangements that are easily documented. In addition, once the plan is established, it must continue to be monitored and reviewed to address changes in circumstances including changes in relevant laws. By seeking experienced, professional guidance, and making decisions that match the goals, desires, and abilities of all concerned parties, the difficult challenges of balancing family and business priorities can be managed, and the likelihood of the future success of the family business for future generations can be optimized.

New IRS Reporting Rules: Leveraging Technology to Manage ACA Requirements

by Chris Bao, Esq., Manager, Employee Benefits Compliance & Regulatory Affairs, Barney & Barney, a Marsh & McLennan Insurance Agency LLC company

For most companies with more than 50 Full-Time and/or Full-Time equivalent employees, 2016 will bring significant new Internal Revenue Service (IRS) employer reporting requirements.

The goal of the IRS: To ensure that your employees maintained health insurance coverage in 2015, in addition to verifying that required employers offered coverage to Full-Time employees, as mandated by the Affordable Care Act (ACA).

Preparation is the key to managing this additional workload brought on by the ACA, which impact your HR, Finance and Payroll teams. Planning is critical if you want to avoid a potentially sizable penalty. Employers may be fined up to $1.5 million for failing to report the proper information to the government.

By January 31, 2016, employers are required to report to an employee what months the employee was offered coverage, in addition to other information related to the coverage. An employer must also transmit this information, along with other information regarding its offer of coverage to all of its employees, electronically to the government by March 31, 2016. Paper transmittals will be due one month earlier.

Based on our discussions with HR managers, many companies are still in the preliminary planning stages, with no finalized plans. But now is the most opportune time to consider a solution or resource to prepare for the administrative workload brought on by these new requirements.

New IRS Forms

The ACA created new reporting requirements for insurance providers and employers.

1. Providers of insurance are required to file information with the government regarding all individuals that are covered under its plan. This information will be used by the government to check whether an individual is enrolled in medical coverage, to help the government determine whether the individual is subject to penalties under the Individual Mandate.

2. Companies considered an Applicable Large Employer (ALE) will also be required to report to the government that they have complied with the ACA’s obligation to offer health benefits to employees. The information will be used by the government to check whether an employer is subject to any penalties under the Employer Mandate.

To verify that information, the IRS created two series of Forms:

- IRS Forms 1094-B and 1095-B (B series Forms)
  - Employees (and individuals) who are citizens or legal residents in the United States must be enrolled in medical coverage, as mandated by the ACA, or suffer a penalty.
  - Form 1094-B notifies the government of the entity that issues insurance, and 1095-B confirms who is enrolled in that insurance provider’s coverage.

- IRS Forms 1094-C and 1095-C (C series Forms)
  - Form 1094-C is a transmittal to the government by a company, summarizing information about the company, and whether it offered coverage to substantially all of its Full-Time employees. This is essentially a cover sheet to be sent to the government that will be attached to all of the company’s 1095-Cs. This Form is due to the government by March 31, 2016 (or one month earlier if the Form is not filed electronically).
  - Form 1095-C explains to each Full-Time employee, and the government, the coverage that was offered to that specific full-time employee, and whether such coverage met certain requirements, including whether the plan was “affordable” to the employee, and whether it provided “minimum value.” It also designates whether the employee was actually enrolled in the company’s health benefits. The company must deliver Form 1095-C to its employees by January 31, 2016.

Employers will be fined $100 per day for each 1095-C form that has not been provided to an employee.

Managing a New Workload

These new reporting requirements will create a substantial new burden on employers. The employee information needed to populate Form 1095-C is often spread across separate technology platforms including payroll, benefits administration systems, and other programs that track employees’ hours worked. Many companies don’t have a sophisticated software system to aggregate all of the data points necessary to satisfy the employer reporting requirements efficiently.

Particularly for companies with high turnover or seasonal employment, new processes should be put in place to streamline the distribution and collection of employee hours as they relate to the new employer reporting requirements.

The MMP MarketLink Solution

Using technology to meet the reporting requirements is the most effective way to manage all of the administrative paperwork.

Over the past year, Barney & Barney / Marsh & McLennan Agency (MMA) has developed MMP MarketLink, the technology solution to help companies manage data aggregation and meet the demands of the new reporting requirements.

One component of the robust MMP MarketLink solution will enable organizations to do the following:

- Track and calculate Variable Hour / Part Time / Seasonal Employee hours through their measurement periods
- Automatically notify HR if employees are gaining Full-Time status or losing coverage as a result of their hours of service during their measurement period
- Aggregate payroll data, benefits information, and time/attendance
- Prepare and transmit all 1094-C and 1095-C Forms for employers
- Provide employers with a snapshot of where their organization stands as it relates to Full-Time and Part-Time employees
- Collect data on different types of employee leave (paid, unpaid, special unpaid) and incorporate that information into an employee’s measurement period

MMP MarketLink can be delivered as a company-branded, private label solution.

The new IRS reporting rules under the ACA demands that companies plan carefully. For those that do, the challenge of the reporting requirements can be managed effectively – to help avoid the potential for significant penalties to employers.

In order to effectively and efficiently manage the new IRS reporting rules employers are encouraged to start planning now. Thankfully, organizations have developed many technology platforms and tools to help mitigate the risk of increased administrative burden and significant penalties. Contact Barney & Barney to learn more about MMP Marketlink as a resource to help your organization navigate the changing employee benefits landscape.

Considerations for Obtaining Business Financing

No matter what business you’re in, there are times when borrowing money makes financial sense and often times, extra capital is needed to allow your company to grow. Trying to finance growth internally can often present challenges for many businesses, especially when upfront investments are required and if proper capital structure and working capital support are not in place.

“Bankers regularly provide financing for all kinds of business purposes including working capital, real estate, equipment and acquisitions, to name a few,” says Brenda Martin, a senior vice president and group manager at Comerica Bank. “Seasoned business owners realize that as changes in their businesses occur, their financing needs may change as well.”

Martin offers the following advice for business owners seeking a partnership from a commercial bank:

Get to know your banker. Commercial banking officers are in business to help your business succeed. Part of their desire is to understand your business and to work with you to help build it, improve cash flow and avoid ‘roadblocks’ that business owners face daily. Ask fellow business owners for recommendations and interview several bankers until you find one who will work hard to understand your business and is motivated to help you succeed.

Provide a detailed business plan. The first step in the loan process is to provide your banker with a comprehensive overview that shows how you make money. This plan is critical to the banker’s understanding of you and your business. It should include a description of your product or service offerings, names and background of key management, a market/competition overview and an outlook for the industry/market.

Provide company financial information. Financial statements are oftentimes referred to as “banker’s blueprints.” They provide the lender with a clear view of the company’s past, present and future. Financial statements should include a balance sheet, income statement and any footnotes necessary to provide the reader with a clear understanding of the company’s financial condition.

Provide personal financial information. “Because personal finances of business owners and their company are so closely related, it is often important for the lender to review the business owner’s personal financial information,” says Martin. “This can be accomplished by providing a personal financial statement, which usually consists of a balance sheet detailing assets (property values, securities held, etc.), liabilities, a breakdown of total personal income (salary, investments, etc.) and details of any minority or majority ownership in Joint Ventures, LP’s, LLC’s, etc. Your banker needs to see the full picture of your finances.”

Explain how the loan proceeds will be used. It is useful to have a detailed explanation of the purpose of the loan. If borrowing funds to purchase machinery or equipment, show a contract outlining the purchase and delivery price. If applying for real estate construction funds, pertinent details from the architect, contractor and/or construction manager will be required.

Every business is different and the needs of different banks may vary. However, by taking the steps outlined above you can ensure a smoother loan process and help determine the best mutual fit for a long-term partner.

Four Tips to Help Family-Owned Businesses
Create a Successful Succession Plan

by Nicha Tabrizi, Vice President & District Manager, Wells Fargo Community Banking South Beach District

Family-owned businesses account for more than 28 percent of U.S. firms, and they play a powerful role in the economy. From small businesses to large entities, there isn’t a one-size-fits-all approach for family-owned businesses and many have unique or complex arrangements when it comes to ownership, roles and responsibilities. However, one commonality that many family-owned businesses share is that they want their business to stay in the family for years to come.

According to a Wells Fargo/Gallup Small Business Index survey, almost half (40 percent) of small business owners said they were motivated to open their business to provide jobs for children or family members in the future, and another 34 percent say that when they retire, they plan to transition their business to a family member. Yet how many family-owned businesses have a succession plan in place?

As you think about the future of your business, it’s a good time to evaluate the status of your succession plan so that you can leave a legacy you’re proud of when it’s time to pass down the business. Here are four things to consider when preparing to develop or update a succession plan for your family-owned business:

- Define family members’ roles – Identifying roles and responsibilities for family members who are active in the business will help you articulate how the transition will impact each stakeholder, and what type of support the successor can expect. If you’re hoping to hand the business down to a son or daughter, now is a good time to check in to understand if he or she wants to be involved in the business long-term, and in what capacity. It is also a good time to take a fresh look at your company’s staffing structure, analyze performance, and assess who is most equipped to lead when you step down.

- Explore financing options – As part of your succession plan, you will need to identify how to properly transition the business to the next owner from both financial and legal standpoints. Is your business a sole proprietorship or is it co-owned? Will your successor outright purchase the business, or will it be gifted to them? Does your business carry any debts? What are the tax implications? These are important questions to ask as you map out your departure from the business. Make sure you have a team of trusted professionals in place, including a banker, CPA and attorney, to help you answer these questions. Schedule time to meet with these professionals to learn more about how you can best fulfill your financial needs, and to design an agreement that’s fair for all family members involved in the business.

- Set up a smooth transition – After you establish the financial and legal aspects of the succession plan, you’ll need to make sure your business is as organized as possible when you hand over the reins. One way you can do this is by creating an up-to-date, streamlined business plan. In a recent survey, only one in three small business owners reported they had a formal, written business plan. To help make it easier for more business owners to prepare plans, Wells Fargo recently introduced a free, online Business Plan Center that provides step-by-step instruction to create or update written business plans.

- Establish a timeframe – As you finalize your succession plan you’ll want to make sure you have a timeline that works for both you and the successor. Build any remaining training into the plan so you can be certain that you’re leaving the business in capable hands. As you communicate your succession plan to family and staff, make your exit strategy clear so everyone knows your role in the business following the transition.

There are many emotions involved in selling or handing down a family business, and a well-organized succession plan will help save you time and money. It also will give your successor the best chance of long-term financial success. For more tips on succession and business planning, visit www.wellsfargoworks.com.

It’s quite normal for closely held businesses to transfer money into and out of the company. But it’s critical that you make those transfers correctly. If you don’t, you might run up against the IRS—the service looks closely at how such transactions are characterized: Are they truly loans or an advance?

Loans might be the best route

When an owner withdraws funds from the company, the transfer can be characterized as compensation, a distribution or a loan. Loans aren’t taxable, but compensation is and distributions may be taxable.

And if the company is a C corporation, distributions can trigger double taxation—in other words, corporate earnings are taxed once at the corporate level and then again when they’re distributed to shareholders (as dividends). Compensation is deductible by the corporation, so it doesn’t result in double taxation. (But it will be subject to payroll taxes.)

If the business is an S corporation or other pass-through entity, there’s no entity-level tax, so double taxation won’t be an issue. Still, loans are advantageous because:

- The compensation is taxable to the owner (and incurs payroll taxes), and
- The distributions reduce an owner’s tax basis, which makes it much harder to deduct business losses.

There are also some advantages to treating advances from owners as loans. If they’re treated as contributions to equity, for example, any reimbursements by the company may be taxed as distributions.

Loan payments, on the other hand, aren’t taxable, apart from the interest, which is deductible by the company. A loan may also give the owner an advantage in the event of the company’s bankruptcy, because debt obligations are paid before equity is returned.

Is it a loan or not?

It’s important to establish that an advance or a withdrawal is truly a loan. Simply calling an advance or a withdrawal a “loan” doesn’t make it so. If you don’t make that distinction, and the IRS determines that a payment from the business is really a distribution or compensation, you (and, possibly, the company) could end up owing back taxes, penalties and interest.

Whether a transaction is a loan is a matter of intent. It’s a loan if the borrower has an unconditional intent to repay the amount received and the lender has an unconditional intent to obtain repayment.

Unfortunately, even if you intend for a transaction to be a loan, the IRS and the courts aren’t mind readers. So it’s critical that you document any loans and treat them like other arm’s-length transactions. Among other things, you should execute a promissory note and charge a commercially reasonable rate of interest—generally, no less than the applicable federal rate (AFR).

You should also establish and follow a fixed repayment schedule and secure the loan using appropriate collateral. (This will also give the lender bankruptcy priority over unsecured creditors.) And you must treat the transaction as a loan in the company’s books. Last, you must ensure that the lender makes reasonable efforts to collect in case of default.

Also, for borrowers who are owner-employees, you need to ensure that they receive reasonable salaries, to avoid a claim that loans are disguised compensation.

The bottom line

The IRS keeps a wary eye on businesses that wish to lend or borrow from themselves. So it’s critical that you retain a qualified advisor. He or she can lead you through the minefields of borrowing from your company.

Family-owned businesses are a big part of the American economy. According to the Small Business Administration, 90% of all businesses in the U.S. (large and small) are family-owned and operated.

Owning a family business presents special challenges due to the 24/7 relationships that need to be maintained. A good foundation for ensuring the success of the business and the relationships involved with running it is to have a strong business plan that family members agree to and support. Following are the steps to take to build a business plan that can be used to make business decisions, help grow the business and even obtain business financing.

First, start with an outline and fill in the blanks as you learn more about the process. There are many tools to consider when embarking on your business plan. Many seasoned entrepreneurs like to calculate a break-even analysis to predict future viability in their respective fields. This analysis is a formula based on the relationship between revenues, fixed costs, variable costs and profit.

Another preliminary tool is a feasibility plan, which features a summary, mission statement, market analysis and required success factors. It also might include an initial cost analysis addressing pricing and potential expenses.

At California Bank & Trust, there are tools and information located on our website’s Business Resource Center www.calbanktrust.com that can help you build your plan. Agencies such as the Small Business Administration (www.sba.gov) and SCORE, the Service Corp of Retired Executives (www.score.org) offer detailed information on developing a solid business plan.

Getting Started

Most experts outline 10 key components for a basic business plan. It is customary to see an Executive Summary – a concise overview of the entire plan – listed first after the Table of Contents, though this will be easier to write after completing the other sections. Key components include: a cover sheet; table of contents; executive summary; company description; product or service description; market analysis; strategy and implementation; time table; management team and a financial analysis.

Plan Your Work and Work Your Plan

Once you’ve written your business plan, it’s time to prioritize goals and get organized. Here are some steps to facilitate the process:

- Start by recording overall business or long-term goals on a spreadsheet. They won’t change often, but you will be referring to them frequently.
- As you write goals, make sure they are what you really want and do not conflict with each other. Set the bar high enough to grow your business.
- Make sure your goals are specific, measurable, attainable, relevant and timely. They must be easily identified, quantified and understood or you won’t know when you reach them.
- Regularly ask yourself, “Does this decision take us closer to or further from our goals?”

Having a documented plan that family members agree to can help smooth the way to good business decision-making and help both the business and family relationships thrive.

Betty R. Uribe

Dr. Uribe has more than 25 years of exceptional experience in the financial industry. As Executive Vice President at California Bank & Trust she has P&L responsibility for multiple business and commercial lending teams across the greater Los Angeles, Orange County, Antelope Valley, and Inland Empire regions for a bank with over $10 billion in assets.
From spaceships to car dealers to famous burger joints and everything else in between has redefined family-owned businesses in Southern California for years. Yet, the statistics are daunting: 40 percent or fewer businesses survive the second generation and only 15 percent or fewer survive the third generation. If you run a family business, you are not entirely surprised by these statistics. Maybe that is why you have avoided the subject. Maybe initial succession conversations with family members have not gone the way you expected. Or, the initial conversations have not been exciting for your successors because they view the business more of a job than an exciting future. Whatever your situation, it is never too early to get family members excited about the family business and to set the tone for succession. Quite often, future generations tend to shy away from the family business because the subject has never been discussed formally and when things start moving in that direction they feel overwhelmed. Rather than take on something they think they are not capable of managing, they decide to move in a different direction and not join the family business at all. Having a well-defined succession plan and the right dialogue will avoid surprises for you and for future leaders of the family business. Thoughtful planning will ensure the family business continues to thrive and prosper under younger leadership. The gift of business ownership is a challenging one but a very rewarding experience you will leave your family for generations to come.

1. The Entrepreneurial Mindset Today and Business (Un) Usual

Think back to the time when you or your family started the family business. Your grandfather, grandmother, mother or father told you this was your next job, handed you a vanilla colored clock-in card and you accepted the job without question. Day in, day out, it was the same predictable labor. Fast forward to 2015, your business is growing, technology is getting more complex, you are scaling and it’s time for the new generation to join the family business but you have not “formally” discussed this option because you assumed it would happen naturally — just the way it did for you. You soon find out the new generation wants to create their own destiny and they don’t think the family business is their thing. Yet, the family business could be exactly the business they envision but it is not apparent to them on the outside. Entrepreneurship comes in many shapes, forms, sizes, viewpoints and ideas. Today’s generation tends not to view the family business as an entrepreneurial business model. Here is your opportunity to open their eyes and minds by taking them on a tour of your own entrepreneurial journey and the rich history of the family business. Start by explaining the business from the bottom up and give them the ability to digest the various areas of the operation. Challenge family members to question why, see opportunities where others don’t, and encourage them to further explore areas of the business that interest them. Get them involved early, start grooming them for succession and to a certain extent, let them play on their own terms. Newer generations are a critical force in business by turning ideas into reality and allowing the new generation to join the family business but you have not “formally” discussed this transition period and let them know it is critical you remain involved. You also need to have realistic expectations on the transition. If it took you 20-30 years to build your business, it cannot be successfully transitioned in 12 months. I work with various types of family businesses and the standard time frame I have seen is 5-10 years of succession planning. This is reasonable and needed.

4. Failure is an Option – Just Make Sure to Get Up Fast

When I look at my family-owned business clients and other succession stories, I see the willingness to accept that failure is an option. Whether it was at the beginning in several false starts or a hiccups along the way as the business evolved. They have continued to build a culture in their organization of pushing the envelope and assessing risks. Sometimes what holds the new generation back is their feeling of not being capable of running a business that has been built over the last 20-30 years. Encourage them to take calculated risks and ask for counsel from the leaders who built the business. Encourage them to view fear as the opportunity and not a roadblock. Often times it all boils down to letting someone know that it is okay to fail, but if they do, all you require is that they get up fast and learn from that lesson.

5. Be Willing to Take it Outside – The Value of Guidance and Expertise

Always enlist the help of your trusted accountant, attorney or financial advisor to help you plan carefully. The success of going from a second to fifth generation family business lies in the right advice and planning. Start by meeting one on one with the next generation and spend the required time to go over all the details with your trusted advisor.

Some of the most critical topics include:

- How is the business transferred both in ownership and control?
- How does the current generation learn to change roles from the #1 star quarterback and being the general on the field to the role of coaching, mentoring, etc.?
- How does the next generation assume the leadership role? What is necessary to earn respect and credibility from family, employees, vendors, customers?
- How is accountability defined and monitored for the protection of everyone?
- How are changes to the vision, business strategies and methods communicated, accepted and implemented by the family team?
- What added value can family members count on from the business and distribution from cash flow?

Follow some of these simple traits and your chances for continuing a family business for generations increases immensely. Remember, reaching the place you are in now took years of hard work. The hard work is not over. The hand off will take careful planning and the execution will not happen overnight. Be patient, savor the moment and feel proud of your accomplishments.

May your legacy live on!

SUSTAINING GROWTH: HOW TO AVOID GROWING YOURSELF OUT OF BUSINESS

By Tom Wagner, EVP and Head of Corporate Finance, Pacific Mercantile Bank

You are an entrepreneur. You are well versed in managing suppliers, customers, employees, and if you are lucky enough to be growing, managing your own company's growth. Rapid sales growth is one of those “problems” many wish they had. But if not managed, it can damage or kill a Company’s future as easily as stalling sales.

You have heard the high growth stories. Large companies like Google, Twitter and Facebook grab headlines with huge sales growth without even the suggestion that growth needs to be managed. In fact, in these instances it probably doesn’t. But unless your production costs are near zero and your working capital investments are self-funded (like the above), you have to manage growth or watch your capital structure weaken, which inhibits the opportunity to reach your vision.

The simple accounting measurement of Return on Equity (ROE = Net Income/Owners’ Equity) provides a decent proxy for how much top line growth your company can sustain. You can grow the top line at a rate that approximates your ROE, assuming:

- Sales growth offers similar gross margins as existing sales
- No changes in working capital requirements
- Steady debt/capital ratio

The “Return” (i.e., net income) must be retained by the business to fund the expansion. Most small business owners take out over half of the earnings produced by the company just to pay taxes. Thus, the ROE calculation, for purposes of determining growth capacity, has to be adjusted to reflect this. This simple calculation (net income/owners’ equity) is called Retained ROE.

As an example, referring to Chart A—Steady Growth, Company XYZ ends 2014 at $20 million in sales with book equity of $4 million and $2 million in bank debt. The Company earns pre-tax margins of 5% (i.e., $1,000,000), which is about average for US manufacturing companies. As a Subchapter S corporation, the taxes are the owner’s responsibility. In order to pay the taxes and offer some cash return to the owners, 60% of pre-tax margin is distributed, leaving only 2 percentage points in the business for growth and investment. The Company’s Retained ROE is 10%, i.e., in 2014 ($1,000,000/$600,000 = $600,000/ $4,000,000 = 10%). In this example, we held all working capital requirements steady relative to sales and forecasted a capital spending plan in excess of depreciation equal to 1% of revenue. If your company is experiencing any real revenue growth, it is also likely experiencing real operating growth, as well.

In Chart A, we see the company can sustain top line revenue growth of 10%, accommodate capital spending, and fund working capital growth—all without changing its debt/capital ratio. In fact, it improves slightly. Additional working capital financing requires additional funding, but debt-to-capital levels are maintained at the same 33%. This is because additional debt is being matched proportionally with retained earnings, leaving the capital structure at a similar level of leverage or even though debt increased by $400,000 by 2016.

To explore the impact of a significant growth spurt, Chart B—Explosive Growth, increases sales growth to 50% in 2015 and 2016 without changing any working capital relationship ships. Net margins remain the same as in the first example, (a simplifying assumption, as not margin would actually have to improve at the operating level to at least cover interest exposure).

Earnings nearly double from $1.2 million in 2016 in Chart A to $2.2 million in Chart B. ROE actually improves from 10% to 16% over the three-year period. There is sufficient cash flow to fund capital spending, but increased funding to support working capital adds $4 million in bank debt and 21 percentage points to the Debt/Capital ratio. At this point, your lender has more capital invested in the business than you do.

Everything in this scenario can be seen as positive: margins were maintained at good levels, and both receivables and inventory were well managed. But the Company lost control of its capital structure. The additional debt service adds a new expense to the company and earnings volatility will increase as a result. Additionally, you now have an unintended, and perhaps unwelcome, partner in your business.

Your bank may happily fund the expansion for a while, but at some point they will want their money back. Operations are using all excess cash flow and increasing bank debt. There is no room for repayment unless your Company starts to shrink. The decision to shrink your company is now in the hands of your banker, and you do not want to be there.

The best case is your lender does not get nervous but institutes a series of covenants that manage and control growth going forward. You do not want to be there either.

At this point, you are likely confused. Everything about your Company points to success, but your lender is expressing concerns. What is going on? Well, you have doubled sales in two years but only increased equity 37%. That is why the ROE has improved. The Company is not more profitable; it’s simply bigger and it got there through debt, subjecting the entire operation to more risk.

In the Explosive Growth example above, most things went right and the Company still faces a potential capital problem. In most high or sudden growth cases, we see margins preserved—as a new big buyer is discounted, or receivables become extended with a big buyer paying slower, or just the simple math of carrying the last 60 days of sales, which are significantly higher than the preceding period, begins to put stress on the operation. And the trade actually becomes more demanding as you begin to place overseas orders.

Under those circumstances, you could wind up in a liquidity crisis with the bank putting on a squeeze when you can least afford it.

Growth is a very welcome opportunity, but without proper planning it can create another wave of anxiety for the business owner. Many aspects of your company will be stressed and tested in high growth environments. Planning for the organizational impact of growth is important. Understanding its financial implications is critical. Many companies have grown themselves out of business.

Build a simple forecast, test some assumptions and then communicate the information to your lenders. An insightful banker will welcome the discussion. An excellent one will initiate it. In finance, risk is defined as uncertainty. The more uncertainty you can remove, the greater your probability of success.

In 1905, Frank Ayres took a train ride from Ohio to Southern California in order to explore land development opportunities in the area. This simple trip led to the Ayres family helping to develop the L.A. area into today’s teeming metropolis, and also helped to establish a family tradition of consistently emphasizing value, community and an exceptional product. With these family business traditions in mind, the Ayres family expanded into the hospitality industry in the 1980s and has now built 22 locations across Southern California.

Innovation has also been a tenet of the Ayres Hotels business strategy, whether it be developing a handcrafted hotel from the ground up or envisioning a new direction for an already established property. This year, the hotel formerly known as Ayres Inn Orange has been re-imagined as the new ALO Hotel by Ayres. The freshly minted ALO Hotel now offers contemporary design elements showcasing sleek accents and bursts of color, as well as more community space for guest interaction. Guests of the hotel will also still find the unwavering commitment to exceptional service and cleanliness that has helped make Ayres Hotels a leader in the hotel industry.

For the Ayres family, the Ayres Hotels have become the capstone in a rich business experience spanning over 100 years. Creativity, steady growth, and an adherence to business traditions and values have ensured a success that has laid the foundation for another 100 years of accomplishment.

McKinley Elevator, Irvine
Mike McKinley, CEO
Mark McKinley, General Manager
Greg Larsen, President, McKinley Equipment

Bill McKinley founded equipment distribution company, McKinley Equipment, in 1948. Though his son, Mike McKinley, could have been in the warehouse learning the business from the bottom up, Mike began work full-time with the company in 1971. By the early 1980s, solid business decisions had the company prospering. Having spent 32 years growing the business, Bill decided it was the right time to transition the business. The first decision was to exit the forklift market, and concentrate entirely on loading dock equipment and other hydraulic lifts. The second was to shift the company’s leadership to his son. By mid-2000s, the McKinley Elevator Division was doing nearly as much business as the McKinley Equipment Division. So, in 2005, McKinley Elevator was established as a sister company to McKinley Equipment with Mike McKinley as president. Greg Larsen, a McKinley family member, took over as president of McKinley Equipment, drawing on over two decades of experience with the company to continue its success. Today, the company employs about 150 employees.

Twining. The company has been led and managed by at least two family members since its establishment over 117 years ago. In 2000, Twining was purchased by Edward Twining Jr. from his father’s estate. Since then, the company has grown over four times in size, becoming one of California’s largest engineering and construction support services firms.
Edward is the fourth generation of the Twining family to be at the helm. He has provided strategic leadership to the growth and development of the company, guiding both the culture and success of Twining. Edward modeled his leadership style after his late father, the former CEO, and is passing on the same proven success to his son, the current CEO. The company’s leadership has been with former U.S. Air Force Serviceman. Edward is a known supporter of the Orange County community, residing in Huntington Beach.
